On a warm Saturday in June 2001, Indianapolis residents Kim and Marissa Manlove’s 16 year old son David, got up early and mowed the yard. Later, he went to a friend’s house to swim, and then made the decision that cost him his life. David and a friend went to a nearby drugstore and bought a can of computer duster. They returned to the pool and inhaled the duster to get high. David dove underwater to intensify the rush. He did it a few times before his heart stopped. David drowned.

David was a popular, athletic young man who played baseball for Lawrence Central High School. He wanted to become an orthopedic surgeon but didn’t realize that inhalants are as dangerous as illegal drugs. He didn’t think they were harmful because you could be purchased at any drugstore or office supply retailer. David had hopes and dreams just as any 16 year old does, and this was not what he wanted for himself.

“Huffing”, the intentional inhaling of a volatile propellant or gas to get high, may seem unthreatening because its effects are short-lived. These propellants and gases which produce this brief euphoria are in hundreds of common household items. So how could they be deadly or harmful? They are harmful because the chemicals that make up propellants in aerosol cans are poisons that were never intended to be introduced into the human body. So why would anyone want to inhale toxic chemicals? It’s because breathing in chemical vapors found in products such as aerosol cans, glue, cleaning fluid, and nail polish remover-produces a quick high. But that high has devastating effects on the body. Inhalants block oxygen from entering the brain and lungs, which can result in suffocation. Huffing can cause heart failure and death within minutes, the very first time you do it. This is known as sudden sniffing death syndrome which caused David’s death.

What can be done? Awareness is the key. When parents are aware of a lethal risk in their home, they do everything possible to warn their children and/or eliminate that risk. But these useful household products can be lethal when abused, and unfortunately few parents and their teens are talking about the dangers of huffing or looking for signs of use. The reality is that every time teens abuse inhalants, they are playing Russian Roulette. National Inhalant and Poison awareness month is intended to be a wake-up call for parents, schools, our entire community -- for more conversation and education. Our children deserve to have information that could save their lives and the lives of their friends. Information permits discussion, which can lead to prevention. We urge parents to take time this month to talk to your teens and pre-teens about huffing. Arm yourselves with information about the dangers of inhalants and how to talk to your kids about drugs through Web sites such as http://www.drugfree.org/, http://www.inhalants.org/, and http://www.the24group.org/.

In the end it was a decision that David made on the spur of the moment that has caused irreparable harm to his family and friends. When you use an inhalant, it’s a life-and-death decision every time you huff.
